“ When you lose someone you have loved your whole life, someone you have been able to depend on no matter what, one of the only people who has always been there for you, you will feel empty. And you will feel broken. But the thing you have to remember is, they taught you better than that. They taught you to be strong. Independent. Courageous. Kind-hearted. Because sometimes people leave, not because they want to, but because their bodies can't hold on any longer. And when that happens they have to trust that what they taught you was enough. They have to trust that you will be okay, because that's what they want more than you could even imagine. They need to know that you will stay strong. That you will live a happy life, even though it has to be without them. And that's what you have to hold onto. As long as you carry your memories of them inside of you, they will never be completely gone. Embrace the life they would have wanted for you. Be happy, even though at times that may seem impossible. Trust that you will be okay.

For my Loving Grandma who was there beside me since I was a little girl you will be missed <3
